In Europe, the walrus is the only native source of ivory. Its tusks, known as 'morse', were often believed to have magical properties.

Whalebone and the teeth and bones of the hippopotamus were used as less expensive substitutes for ivory during the Middle Ages. Deer antlers and horn from goats and cattle were also worked to look like ivory.

Walrus (Odobenus rosmarus) ivory, from the Arctic and Subarctic seas, was much appreciated in northern Europe and the British Isles throughout the Middle Ages and was a sought-after substitute for elephant ivory when the latter was in short supply. Similarly, whalebone was occasionally used as an ivory substitute because the larger pieces could approximate the breadth of African elephant dentine, but the more porous material was less amenable to carving and retained a matte surface.
